He stared with steady eyes that saw nothing, through the windows, at the opposite wall, and listened while Birotteau poured out a long discourse. Evidently while he heard he deliberated; he was pondering the case with the inflexibility of a Minos who crossed the Styx of commerce, when he left the Quai des Morfondus for his little third-floor dwelling. Well, uncle, asked Birotteau at last, expecting some answer to a final entreaty to sell rentes worth six thousand francs a year. Well, my poor nephew, I cannot do it. Things have gone too far. We, the Ragons and I, shall both lose fifty thousand francs. It was by my advice that the good folk sold their shares in the Wortschiu Mines. I feel myself bound, if they lose the money, not to replace their capital, but to...
